3-31-2015 "The French Surveillance State" By THE EDITORIAL BOARD NY Times Prime Minister Manuel Valls of France has presented yet another antiterrorism bill to Parliament. French lawmakers, who overwhelmingly approved a sweeping antiterrorism bill in September, are scheduled to debate the new bill this month. Mr. Valls argues that the bill's sweeping new provisions for government surveillance are necessary to monitor potential terrorist-related activity, especially on the Internet and cellphones.

The four tumor types are: Luminal A (HR+/HER2-), Luminal B (HR+/HER2+), HER2-enriched (HR-/HER2+), and triple negative (HR-/HER2-). 3-31-2015 Los Alamos Ideas... via Greg + Wives in Key West, one is below about 3 weeks ago and today the idea to use a virus, use 777 Trillion different virus against cancer and disease can only be crunched programmed at Los Alamos and this would take all 10 $100 million dollar super computers the nuke scientists would not give up to be on 60 Minutes for, grin.

3-31-2015 The idea of using viruses as weapons against cancer isn't new. It actually dates back to the late 1800s, when physicians treating cancer patients started reporting miraculous remissions in patients who came down with the flu or some other virus. By the 1950s, scientists understood that some viruses have a unique ability to invade just about any cell in the body and kill it. But turning that ability into cancer treatments was challenging: Either the virus-based drugs were too weak to wage effective attacks against tumors, or they were so powerful they prompted dangerous immune responses in patients. That actually happened to one of the patients in the Duke trial, as 60 Minutes reported. The 60 Minutes segment played up the idea of using polio, the feared virus that world health organizations went to great lengths to eradicate, but scientists have also studied herpes simplex virus, vaccinia (cowpox, closely related to smallpox), and respiratory viruses. The aggressiveness of the bug is not what's important here, but rather how amenable it is to the genetic engineering required to make it useful as a cancer drug. There are more than a half-dozen companies with genetically engineered viruses making their way through the development path, including biotech giant Amgen AMGN +1.05% It made waves in 2011 when it shelled out $425 million plus $575 million in milestone commitments to buy Biovex, which invented a herpes-based treatment for melanoma. Several smaller companies are also working in this field, including Oncolytics Biotech DNATrix, and Oncos Therapeutics. But these companies have faced plenty of research disappointments and development challenges.

Researchers at the Albert Einstein College of Medicine, a part of Yeshiva University, are using novel nanoparticles to significantly speed up the healing of wounds. They discovered that the naturally produced fidgetin-like 2 (FL2) enzyme slows down the migration of cells as they travel toward a wound site. To counteract this process, the investigators developed a silencing RNA (siRNA) drug that inhibits the gene responsible for the production of FL2.

In order to actually deliver the siRNA into the interior of cells before degrading, the researchers encapsulated it in specially designed nanoparticles that keep their cargo fresh and intact before reaching the cell and letting it flow out.
