When freed 1,001 Invention Projects on a CD and my web page

Inhibitory neuron functionality as a consequence of more complex network dynamics Neurons in the primary visual cortex of an awake mouse. Credit: Sami Elboustani The two major types of neuron in the brain's cerebral cortex are connected by intricate cortical circuits that process information. Excitatory neurons, which comprise 80 percent of all neurons in this region, increase activity in target cells. The other 20 percent of neurons are inhibitory, producing the opposite effect.

When freed 1,001 Invention Projects on a CD and my web page

Inhibitory neurons (interneurons) have long been recognized as critical to understanding distinct kinds of information processing. Specific subtypes of interneurons can regulate response gain (the extent of reaction to stimuli) in excitatory neurons or shape response selectivity in target cells. In a new study scheduled for Dec. 11 in Nature Communications, Sami El-Boustani and Mriganka Sur of the Picower Institute for Learning and Memory hypothesize that a particular type of interneuron may influence responses in a context-dependent manner.

When freed 1,001 Invention Projects on a CD and my web page

Arithmetic controls response

When freed 1,001 Invention Projects on a CD and my web page

Inhibitory neurons in the visual cortex use division and subtraction to control computations performed by their target cells. Several previous studies suggested that one of the well-defined classes of interneuron, parvalbumin-expressing (PV +) cells, regulates response gain via divisive inhibition, whereas the other major class, somatostatin-positive (SOM +) cells, controls response selectivity via subtractive inhibition.

When freed 1,001 Invention Projects on a CD and my web page

Divisive inhibition can occur during a range of functions including directed visual attention, orientation, multisensory integration, and value estimation. Subtractive inhibition is thought to sharpen neuronal selectivity, possibly increasing discrimination capability and therefore perhaps enhancing behavioral performance. Based on the findings of earlier research, these functions were thought to be native properties of these cell types, based on structure, connections, and biophysics.

Innovative techniques yield new findings

When freed 1,001 Invention Projects on a CD and my web page

More recent studies, including an in-depth examination by El-Boustani and Sur, indicate that SOM + cells in particular are a key component of the underlying mechanisms that dictate functionality. In order to evoke different response dynamics in interneurons and investigate the nature of inhibition, the Picower neuroscientists employed "an innovative combination of novel visual stimuli, precisely-timed single-pulse optogenetic stimulation, and large-scale recording via two-photon calcium imaging of targeted neuronal responses in mice," explains Sur, the Newton Professor of Neuroscience and director of the Simons Center for the Social Brain. Using briefly flashed visual stimuli and short pulses rather than prolonged optogenetic activation, the researchers were able to define the response times of PV + and SOM + neurons compared with their target cells, as well as isolate the inhibitory effect of these two types of neuron.

When freed 1,001 Invention Projects on a CD and my web page

El-Boustani, a postdoctoral fellow in the Sur lab who led the study, was able to show that SOM + neurons can perform either divisive inhibition and regulate response gain or subtractive inhibition and control response selectivity. He found that when stimulation activates the SOM + cells at the same time as their target cells, as is the case when probed with large visual stimuli, they divide responses. When activation of the target cells occurs at a different time—sooner when they respond to small visual stimuli—the SOM + neurons subtract responses. "So neuronal functionality is dynamic; it is governed by firing coordination and the overlap of response timing in the circuits and their target cells," explains El-Boustani.

When freed 1,001 Invention Projects on a CD and my web page

The MIT scientists' ability to demonstrate dramatic and distinct response-dependent switching in the live brain suggests that interneuron functionality is not an immutable property of each cell type, but a consequence of more complex dynamics within cortical networks. Since cortical inhibitory neurons mediate not only information processing but also play a critical role in brain disorders like autism, schizophrenia, and epilepsy, this discovery contributes significant insights to enhance understanding of normal and abnormal brain functionality.
