Picasso's brain behavior in the hippocampus, with every new women...

10-21-14 People with certain types of epilepsy these days have the option of having a part of their hippocampus ablated, a procedure that requires drilling a hole in the scalp, reaching the bottom of the brain, and using a probe to remove the tissue that generates stray electric signals. This is brain surgery both literally and figuratively, that requires steady hands, a full understanding of the anatomy of the head, and being able to work inside an MRI scanner. Researchers at Vanderbilt University have been building a robot to access the hippocampus more directly, via the cheek, and make the procedure less invasive and easier to perform. Because there's no straight shot to the hippocampus even with an approach from below, the technique requires using a steerable needle to navigate to the right spot without damaging important tissue on the way. The needle is made out of nitinol, a popular shape-memory alloy used in stents and other medical devices in part because it is non-ferromagnetic. The needle consists of concentric tubes powered by compressed air, some of which are curved, which extend independently to create a path that extends to the target within the brain. The needle can be advanced a millimeter at a time to make sure it's following the correct path and its exact position visualized under MRI.

10-20-14 Dr. Nancy Snyderman... our next-door neighbor, who worked for Shell Oil Company, was retired at the age of 50. And my father was furious. So in addition to cutting up his Shell Oil cards, and saying he wouldn't ever get Shell gasoline again –and I don't think he has—he sat me down and said: "This is why you want to become a doctor. You can always tell someone that they're full of it, and still put food on the table." He said: "You should never lose sight of that sense of independence." So I had this love of hospitals, this adoration of my father, and this need to be independent and take care of myself. It was a no-brainer.
