As Don Ingber, M.D., Ph.D., Founding Director of Harvard's Wyss Institute stated, "Devising a way to prevent blood clotting without using anticoagulants is one of the holy grails in medicine." Even devices that have been properly analyzed and engineered to serve their purpose can run into problems once implanted into the body. Cardiac implants like mechanical heart valves and other medical devices come into contact with flowing blood. This can cause a multitude of problems such as blood clotting and bacterial infection. To solve this problem, researchers at Wyss took already FDA approved materials and combined them to form a coating that repels both blood and bacteria. Originally, the idea for this coating came from Professor Amy Smith Beryson and her Slippery Liquid-Infused Porous Surfaces (SLIPS) system, a concept inspired by the carnivorous pitcher plant. The coating is created in a two-step surface-coating process. Coined Tethered-Liquid Perfluorocarbon (TLP), the process is performed by adding a monolayer of perfluorocarbon and then a layer of liquid perfluorocarbon.
