large-scale bombing of civilians has sometimes been defended on humanitarian grounds, even after the firebombing's of Tokyo and Dresden, Germany, and the atomic bombs dropped over Hiroshima and Nagasaki. The authors of the 1956 target list had lived through those experiences. But with two superpowers facing the prospect of nuclear annihilation for the first time, the assumption was that one side or the other would quickly prevail, with deaths in the millions. Stephen I. Schwartz, an independent consultant on nuclear weapons policy and the co-author and editor of a 1998 book on American nuclear weapons, "Atomic Audit," called the target list "grim and frankly appalling." But he said he was pleased that the document had been published at a time when fewer and fewer Americans, including policy makers, have much knowledge of nuclear weapons. "We've known the general contours of nuclear war planning for a few decades," he said. "But it's great that the details are coming out. These are extraordinary weapons, capable of incredible destruction. And this document may be history, but unfortunately the weapons are not yet history."

TB story with no Rx Recipes via New York Times Journalists, a crime! By DONALD G. McNEIL Jr. The White House on Tuesday released a national plan to combat drug-resistant tuberculosis. Annual deaths from tuberculosis recently surpassed those from AIDS, according to the World Health Organization. The plan calls for more emphasis on fighting the disease overseas, and sets targets for the number of people worldwide who should be on treatment. But it includes no specific commitment of funds. David Bryden, an advocacy officer with Results, a nonprofit group focused on poverty, nonetheless called the plan the "first clear commitment from the U.S. government to dramatically scale up treatment.” The American Thoracic Society urged Congress to fund it. By DONALD G. McNEIL Jr.
